

Jesus Christ is looking down from heaven (wherever that is) and is talking to his Father. "Father, as you know I was walking the earth two thousand years ago and tried to spread the word that we should love our fellow man and follow the code that you gave to Moses. And I would add also that all people should treat their fellow man the way they themselves would like to be treated. I never taught that people should treat each other kindly EXCEPT if they were Buddhist or Hindu or Jews as I am—I taught that they should love their neighbor as themselves. When I look down and see the fighting all over the world I am discouraged that my efforts might have come to naught. I am particularly upset about the greed and intolerance that I see. Even more distressing is, in spite of the fact that after my crucifixion my disciples tried valiantly to carry on my teaching even to the extent that they promulgated a new religion which they named after me. There have been millions of people killed in my name who outwardly profess to be Christians. Almost as bad is the squandering of wealth and resources on palatial edifices and trappings in the name of religion when it should have been much better spent on helping and healing the poor and sick. Of course I do not know what your long time objectives are for mankind but I wish there will be a way to bring more love, charity, tolerance and elimination of avariciousness to all those on earth. I pray to you my Father that your will be done"...
